The Scream

Could the red sky of the painting "The Scream" be due to a volcano?

The eruption of a volcano in Indonesia in 1883 is said to have caused the red color of the sky on the famous painting "The Scream" painted by the Norwegian Edvard Munch in Oslo ten years later.

In an article published in the journal "Sky and Telescope," Professor Donald Olson of Texas State University claims to have found the exact facts and location that inspired Munch to create this painting of modern anxiety. In fact, according to the professor, the location would be a place where Munch and his friends had seen "a sky on fire".

The physics professor and his colleagues determined that the materials (lava, gas, dust, etc.) sent into the atmosphere by the eruption of the Krakatoa volcano are responsible for the rather red color of the sky in Europe from November 1883 to February 1884. According to the same scientists, dozens of articles in Norwegian newspapers at the time show that the phenomenon has been observed several times.
